

Now if you have read all the preceding pages of this book, do you not agree that Grandfather and Grandmother, although they did not have many of the things which seem to you essential for your happiness, nevertheless had a happy childhood, filled with interesting experiences which they can well recall with pleasure?

If you have enjoyed this picture of childhood under conditions quite different from your own, we enjoin it upon you some day, if you have children or grandchildren, in turn to write them a record of your happy childhood.
